When I log into my Raspberry Pi, I have to run a command like sudo init 6 every time after I log in. It stops the GUI from loading, and after some time it gives me the login screen again, which I can now make it to not fail when I log in. This is a bit of a hassle though, since I always have to make sure to wait a few minutes before I log in. How can I not have to do this at all? A: Usually sudo init 6 will not prevent the GUI from loading. The GUI (Gnome Desktop) is a client for the X Window system. There are other client programs, too, and you can switch between them using the "Switch to another virtual terminal" in the Session & Startup menu. Q: .NET MVC Action Filter is not firing when requesting a webpage from server? I've got a static page application (with a web forms user interface) which requests a dynamic webpage from the web servers, via a series of JQuery AJAX calls. Now, one of the methods that makes one of these AJAX calls, lets through a 'Validator' class to determine whether it's valid or not. In my global.asax I have an 'Application_Error' event handler, that calls the "Server.Transfer" method. This appears to fire fine, as the browser loads my error page, and shows a modal dialog informing the user of their error. However, in my validator class, I call the Validate method and set the 'Result' to 'Validation.Success'. This is then displayed in the modal dialog, but the server side Validate method is not called. Instead, I see a "Continuation" of "Redirect" in the event viewer and the 'Server.Transfer' method fires. Since the server-side Validate method is not being called, the 'BadRequest' state is being returned with a redirection - which makes sense. Any ideas on how to get this error handling working in a way that the server side validation can be called to determine if the error should be handled as a redirection or a showing of the error page in

There is no consensus on reporting methods used by oncologists to assess patterns of success and failure in patients (pts) treated with immune checkpoint inhibitors (ICI).
